Commentary

December was marked by an unusually early onset of the traditional pre-Christmas low levels of liquidity, combined with elevated market volatility. In the aftermath of the EU/IMF bailout of Ireland in November, subordinated financial issues staged a partial recovery in early December, though senior bank debt performed relatively poorly amid concerns that senior bondholders could be forced to share the costs of future bailouts. During the month we put money to work in non-financial corporate issues, concentrating on those areas set to remain beneficiaries of the trend of rising demand for commodities in emerging markets, adding exposure to raw material supplier Glencore. We also lifted some of portfolio's hedging in non-financial corporates, both at the single-name and index levels. Over the month our exposure to high-yield, non-financial corporate and financial corporates rose by approximately 2.0%, 3.1% and 9.3% respectively, with the latter largely achieved through much-reduced hedging of the portfolio's exposure. However, we maintained our hedging on UK government issues, retaining our view that gilts could yet suffer from any potential overspill of the Irish crisis. Elsewhere, we locked in healthy gains from our interest rate strategies, taking profits from our duration stances in both the US and Europe; we closed our exposure to German Schatz short-dated bond futures at a very advantageous level, before taking the opportunity to re-establish some exposure later in the month.
