Commentary<sup>4</sup>

Market sentiment remains extremely sensitive to news headlines regarding US President Trump’s trade policies. In this regard, April was marked by continued high volatility following a slew of new tariffs announced early in the month. Despite this, and a 3% strengthening of sterling versus the dollar, the Company NAV ended the month largely unchanged. The Company’s large weighting to precious metals helped defend against softness in more economically-led commodities. We continue to have a high conviction on the gold miners given US trade uncertainty will likely drive further flows from Central Banks into gold. The mining companies remain attractively valued versus historic earnings multiples and free cash flow, which was further evidenced by sector company reporting. We believe generalists continue to have limited exposure to the sector, either via physical or the mining equities. Inflows from generalist funds remains a key catalyst we look for to drive further gains and a catch up from the mining companies. Q1 reporting has supported our belief that cost inflation pressures remain limited and thus the sector can continue to sustain the current high margins even before any further upside in gold pricing.

Tariffs will likely deter investment following a period of elevated activity supporting our low weighting to economically sensitive copper and oil, although for oil at least valuations are approaching a level that may be close to pricing this in and see us begin to reallocate back. However, because industries worldwide sought to mitigate the effects of tariffs with pre-emptive inventory building, their impact is only just starting to feed through to fundamental economic data. Consumer purchases have begun to slow and businesses are reassessing discretionary capex as they wait and see where tariff levels settle. In the US, Q1 GDP dipped into contraction following a rise in its trade deficit during March, while China’s manufacturing PMI slipped back into contraction in April. The slowdown is filtering into global growth estimates; after downgrading US GDP growth forecasts, from 2.1% to 1.7% for 2025, the US Fed’s April commentary attested to the risks from stagflation and rising unemployment. We see further downside risks to economic data and thus continue to believe the large precious metal weighting remains the best exposure over the next few months.

The US administration’s policies look to be inhibiting growth, straining international relations, complicating central bank monetary policy and undermining confidence in the President. How long these self-inflicted pressures can persist also remains uncertain as more pain may need to show in data in order to bring about an easing of the current headline framework. Furthermore, the manner in which US policies have been implemented may have longer lasting effects, both on the speed and extent with which the new equilibrium is restored after this jolt. Of note, the shake out has prompted a reappraisal of risks and US treasuries are no longer seen as the “risk free” assets they were. In such an environment, central banks may continue adding gold to reserves and an allocation to “safe haven” assets remains preferred in the Company. Indeed, the gold price rose over 5% in April and the outlook for robust earnings continues to highlight attractive valuations of related equities. This environment contributed positively to the Company’s returns over the month, notably from Greatland Gold and Emerald Resources.

Monthly Investor Report – CQS Natural Resources Growth and Income PLC – April 2025

Commentary (continued)

During April, crude oil markets felt the brunt of GDP downgrades, but thankfully didn't weigh too heavily on NAV given the reduced energy weighting and greater exposure to gas over oil. This hastened a Saudi Arabia-led shift in OPEC strategy away from defending the oil price to gaining market share. This combined effect meant benchmark crude prices dropped over 15% during the month. For the Company, the positive precious metal contribution was largely offset by weaker performance from energy names, including E&P's Diamondback and Vermilion. Proposed US fees on Chinese built ships entering US ports were watered down, but uncertainty continues to disrupt trade flows into the US. The progress on fees has supported the Very Large Crude Carrier (VLCC) day rates despite demand fears that are weighing on oil. Frontline's share price rose over 12% in the month as a result.

London Metal Exchange (LME) copper prices declined a moderate 6% over the month, with the prospect of some Chinese fiscal stimulus providing relative support versus crude prices. Having mandated an increase in borrowing capacity, the People's Bank of China (PBOC) appears well positioned to deliver stimulus this year, although we continue to believe its actions will be selective. It will likely target investment in infrastructure such as nuclear power generation, with less emphasis placed on property like has been witnessed previously. The Company continues to avoid iron ore markets which have been the beneficiaries of pre-emptive steel stockpiling. Iron ore face challenges from Chinese steel capacity restrictions and rising seaborne supplies from large scale development projects such as Simandou in Guinea. Uranium equities recovered markedly after their recent drop and Nexgen made a useful contribution to returns over the month. We believe this critical industry remains a focus of investment around the world and should continue to see secular improvement.
