MANAGER COMMENTARY

April marked an end to some of the trends that had been witnessed in equity markets during 2022 to date. For the portfolio this meant a burst of performance for the consumer staples sector, which returned 8.0% in the month in sterling. In the context of the MSCI World Index being down -3.8%, in sterling terms this is a considerable reversal of fortune, which has come on the back of a prolonged period of lacklustre performance as we have discussed in recent investment views. Whilst the sector looks good value, the first quarter financial results coming from the companies in the sector are showing a continuation of the impact of input cost inflation that started in the latter half of 2021. For example, Nestlé expects inflation impacts to continue to affect margins through 2022, and Procter & Gamble are using some of the company's ample cash flow to build inventories to secure supply. This latter point is something we are witnessing at businesses across a range of industries – Swedish technology firm Henkel and German medical equipment maker Siemens Healthineers have made the same comment regarding electronic components. Most companies are saying that they are not concerned that they will not be able to get hold of the input components and other ingredients like chemical feedstocks. However, there is a price to be paid to ensure that this remains the case. Hexagon are an exception in this regard, as CEO Olla Rollen estimates that a shortage of components reduced its organic revenue growth by six percentage points in the first quarter of the year. That the company still increased revenues by 10% hints at the strong demand that Hexagon is experiencing for its products. Solid demand is a near-universal story at the portfolio companies that have reported results so far, no matter which sector the business operates in.

Integration into the investment process

We consider engagement with companies as an opportunity. Discussing challenges with companies enables us to understand their business context and obtain more information about their mitigation of and resilience to the risks that we perceive. Ultimately though we are seeking to create long-term value for our clients through improving the sustainability characteristics of a company. However, we understand that all this takes time and a measured approach.
